

Time Hoppers

The Silk Road

The vision

Imagine growing up without seeing yourself represented in media or, worse, seeing your culture misrepresented. This is the reality many Muslim and Arab parents face living in the West.

As the director of Time Hoppers, my vision is to change this narrative, especially during childhood - one of the most formative stages of life.

The Children's Media Lab, an organization dedicated to research on children's media, revealed stark underrepresentation of Middle Eastern, South Asian, and Indigenous characters in animated content.

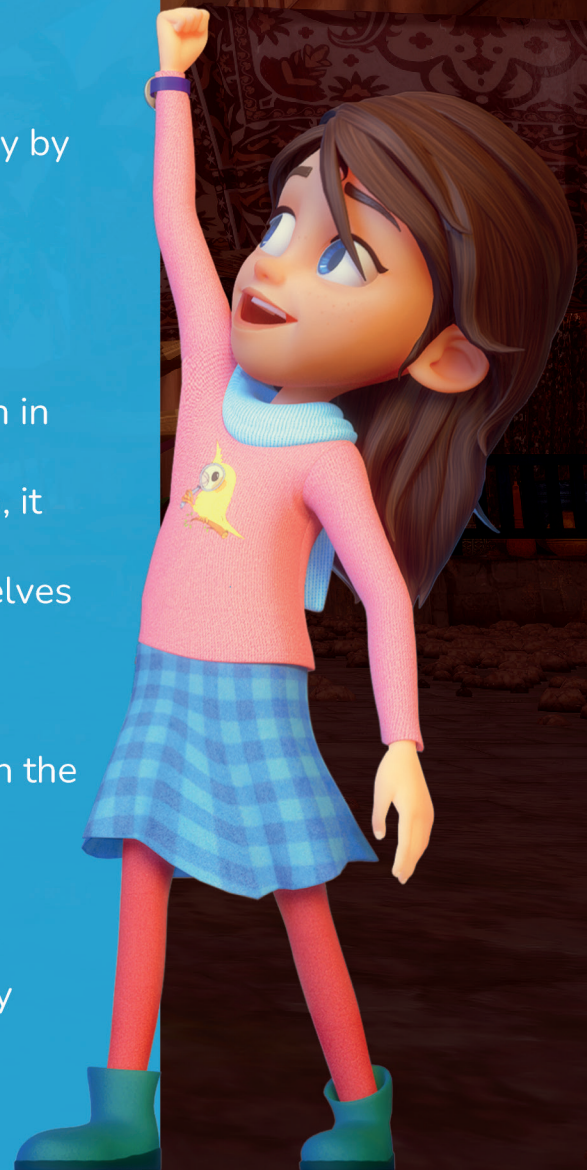

The representation we see in media matters. A study by Common Sense Media points out, exposure to stereotypical portrayals can negatively impact self-esteem, confidence, and academic performance among marginalized groups.

Time Hoppers aims to create positive representation in children's film, featuring a diverse cast that reflects the world today. But beyond representation, it celebrates the rich history of the Silk Road, allowing children from these cultures to see themselves as pivotal to the development of the modern world.

This project is deeply personal to me as a minority in the West having raised four children where Islamophobia is a daily occurrence.

Time Hoppers is more than just a project; it's a movement to uplift and empower BIPOC children by saying, "You matter." Through our storytelling, we celebrate their perspectives and foster a rich cultural identity that inspires confidence and pride.

When Abdullah, Aysha, Khalid and Layla stumble upon the ability to time travel, they are thrust into an adventure along the historic Silk Road to save the great scientists of that era from an evil time travelling alchemist named Fasid. Will the Time Hoppers be able to save the foundations of modern science and safely return home?

Synopsis

In 2050, a prestigious school for the gifted known as Aqli Academy accepts its newest student 12-year-old Layla.

Following a raid by the shadowy Zoola, Inc. at Layla's home, she and her father Habib are forced to relocate to Aqli, where they take on secret identities.

At Aqli, Layla reunites with Khalid, her cousin. She also makes two new friends: Aysha and Abdullah. The four are recruited by Dean Hafsa (also Habib's sister) to participate in a secret time travel project. In an accident, the children are thrust back in time landing in 825 Baghdad at the House of Wisdom.

In a terrible twist, the children inadvertently provoke an aggrieved alchemist named Fasid who has just been expelled from the House of Wisdom. Fasid acquires time travel abilities from the children, vowing to destroy the history of science.

The four children become "Time Hoppers" attempting to foil Fasid's evil design, jumping through time and the amazing places along the historic Silk Road to save the heroes that gave the world modern science.
